Thursday 27/01/2022

TIME

18.00- 20.00 Greece

17.00- 19.00 Norway

16.00- 18.00 Iceland

THEME

Women are the ones that are mostly affected during COVID-19 by gender-based violence, lockdowns, unemployment and with risk of being exposed to the virus, as the vast majority of healthcare workers are women. Even though, feminist critics have pointed out the negative consequences of excluding women from decision making positions in policy making about COVID-19, only 25% are female global leaders. The absence of gender balanced decision-making bodies at a global level is likely to affect how gender issues are included or marginalized in policy agendas. The exclusion or marginalization of women from relevant decision-making committees is usually legitimized during crises, such as the lockdown, by arguments that stress the urgency of policy measures and requirements for high level expertise.

However, lack of consideration for gender balance in decision making may also have adverse longer-term impacts as institutional practices become consolidated. In post-coronavirus societies, the state of emergency is likely to continue for health or financial reasons pushing for further marginalization of gender issues. Conversely, states in which women have managed to overcome sexist constraints and rise to the top of decision-making hierarchies are more likely to respond in gender sensitive ways to the COVID-19 challenge.
